Occupational deafness was first prescribed as an occupational disease in 1975. This report reviews the current schedule of industrial injuries in relation to occupational deafness, in order to examine the effectiveness of benefits and to identify measures to improve the system for the assessment of claims. It recommends that the current approach to assessment and the present disablement scale should continue to be used. The scope for recommendations to change the compensation threshold and aggregation has been limited due to the significant gaps in available scientific evidence, particularly regarding the relationship between occupational noise exposure and resulting hearing loss. The report calls for further research in order to inform future recommendations for change.
